But this percentage of verifications, we have reason to believe, is sensibly greater when the predictions are based not merely upon empirical rules, but equally upon a consideration of such general principles as must form the groundwork of the true deductive science. The foundations of the new meteorology are necessarily found in the simple laws of mechanics. They have been considered by several authors, but by none with so much completeness as in the work of Ferrel Vol. xi. --29 On the Motions of Fluids and Solids, relative to the Earth's Surface (Nashville, 1854, and New York, 1860). In this treatise the motions and figure of the atmosphere are first treated of, on the hypothesis that no resistance is offered by obstacles or by friction upon the earth's surface; in a subsequent section the influence of such resistance is considered, on the hypothesis that...
