Excerpt: .Mrs. Willison was evidently painfully uneasy, and yet she was striving to maintain perfect nonchalance. Mrs. Munn found herself in a position so exceedingly awkward, that she was glad to extricate herself from it as soon as possible. I vshould be pleased to see you at our house, Miss Randolph, she said, as she rose to go. I will do myself the pleasure to call very soon, replied Pauline, in a kind, cheerful tone, which caused the disappointed mother to feel a warm glow of gratitude. Mrs. Willison was a specimen of humanity that Pauline could not weigh in the scales of her philosophy. Her conduct, too, was utterly incomprehensible to a simple, unsophisticated girl, governed by right principles. Poor Mrs. Willison was dissatisfied with that world. for which she had so ardently longed--the world of the city. The world of Cranford she totally...
